D The fourth Roman letter, is almost of the same figure with that in the celebrated ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ inscription, which was brought into Britain by William Sherrard, Doctor of laws, a gentleman eminent for his knowledge in many parts of curious learning; who, being Consul at Smyrna, ordered it with the utmost care and diligence to be copied from a huge stone lying still at Sigeum, where the literature 2300 years ago, which was before the use of the long vowels, and double consonants had obtained, shows itself not only to the wonder and admiration of the curious, but also to the great benefit and advantage of students, and criticks in the Greek tongue; especially as illustrated by the reverend and learned Divine and Antiquary Mr. Chishull. In this monument the angles which are unequal, thus Δ, come nearer the form of the Roman than the modern Δ, whose angles are equal; and therefore more easily slip into the form of the Italian D, by leaveing the left angle as it was, and circumflecting the two others for the greater haste in writing; which was done soon after, as we plainly see in the noble inscription of Herodes Atticus, that learned Critick and Antiquary, which was graven on his pillars exactly both in letters and spelling after the pattern of remote ages: vid. Gruter. Inscript. p. 27. Nor is it a wonder that the Latin letters are the same with the Greek, since Latium itself was anciently called Græcia major. Thus much I thought fit to premise with respect to the form of the letter. As to its name, this, as well as all the other letters, the Romans seem to have called by the Greek names of Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta, &c. Whence Juvenal, Hæc discunt omnes, ante Alpha & Beta, puellæ. Sat. 14, 209.

Thus also Cicero calls his country seat Æ Formicæ, Digamma, because it begins with the Æolian F.

With respect to the power of this letter, it hath a middle sound between t and th; and therefore hath its place in the middle of the last Rank of the Mutes, being a t hardened, as t is a d softened; and both of them, as well as those of the other ranks, frequently changed into each other; for example, from μάδος comes mutus; from αἰδός, the genitive of αἶς, sagitta; from αἶθε, ador; from αἰέθω, perdo; from γαίθω, gaudeo. Neither doth our English tongue refuse this change, at coming from ad; what from quid; two from duo; three, and thrust, from tres, trudo; and water from ὑδωρ. It also admits of a substitute out of the second rank of its sisters, to soften its sound, as quicquid, quicquam, quicque, for quid.

quidquid, &c. Neither doth this letter refuse an intercourse with three of the liquids, viz. l, n, r. To omitt Greek words, wherein their mutual offices are most obvious, as less instructive to the younger sort, for whose service these notes upon literature, in the proper sense of the word, are principally designed; the ancients said lingua, sedda, for lingua, setta; cadamitas for calamitas; dispenner for dispendere; arventus for adventus; and this letter still keeps its post in arbiter and arcessio. It also corresponds with the solitary s, as ῥόδον, rosa. It admitts before it in the same, or diverse, syllables, of the mutes, b; as, ῥέω, pedo, bdellium, abdico; and g, but not in the same syllable, as, ῥυδός, smaragdus: of the liquids, l, n, r, in diverse syllables; as, caldā, candor, cardo: and in the Latin tertius, and the English Third, you have all the three of the last rank exemplified. In the preposition ad, d may keep its place almost before any consonant, or be changed into the consonant of the begining word, except b, v, and j; as, adcurro, or accurro, &c. but the change is more usual in many words, to make the pronounciation softer, or quicker; for we seldom write adcommodo, adculo, &c. in these cases indeed use is the best rule. This letter was also anciently used to prevent the collision of two vowels in different words, as, Censes med esse? for me esse, Plaut. which use it still retains in the same word; as, prodes, proderam, prodire, for proes, proeram, proire. Yea in the most ancient times, it was added to the precedeing word even before consonants, as it should seem to make the sound more masculine, for instance in the Duilian or Bilian pillar, where we read In altod marid puenandod, for In alto mari pugnando. Lastly, in numerals D stands for 500; being not a letter, but rather used for a numeral mark, as the Greeks use ς for 6, and the Hebrew י for 90: for the numeral note of 1000, being Ϟ, from the old ϡ, one half thereof is Ϟ; which for the more speedy writeing, being drawn close together, makes D.

E, the second vowel, and fifth letter in the alphabet, receives its origin from the Hebrew ׀, to which it answers in alphabetical order, and from which also it takes its figure: for by turning it to the right, to comply with our way of writing, it stands thus ׀; and by takeing the separate perpendending line, and joining it transverse to the foot, that it may answer the top line, we easily form E. There is indeed another figure of the Greek letter, but later, viz. ε, which our Saxon ancestors borrowed from them without any variation. This letter was both long and short in the old Greek, as it is still in most languages, who pronounce εἶγω, and εῖγω, though of a quite different sense, and innumerable such words, after the same manner; from which ambiguity often ariseth. To obviate this, and perhaps some other inconveniencies, they invented H to express the long sound, or, to speak more properly, b. a. ir al phabet of one of its letters, which were but sixteen, and supplied the want of it by a mark of aspiration tion, writeing ἠθμός for HETHMOΣ. But this only could supply the want of their banished H in the beginning of their words, therefore they found themselves under a necessity of inventing three letters more to express it in the middle, namely Θ, Χ, Φ. But of this see more in the letter H.

To proceed, this letter E in old Greek was pronounced like ε, as ο was sounded like ο. In Latin, it is changed into, and hath a mutual intercourse with, all its sister vowels, and they likewise with it; e. g. into a, as from fero comes fatus, from reor, ratus; so also in like manner a is changed into e, as from tracto comes detrecto; e into i, as from emo comes eximo and perimo; and in like manner i into e, as for instance eligans, which was written by the ancients for elegans, as Gellius informs us, 11, 2; and in some words these vowels are used indiscriminately, as heri or here. Augustus and Livy, as we are told by Quintilian, Instit. Orat. 1, 7. took the liberty of writeing other words, as sibe and quase for sibi and quasi. Thus also upon a supposition that this way of writeing came nearest to the common pronunciation; for e in Latin, as well as Greek, was pronounced ei; whence the Romans in the three like cases of the plural number of the third declension, writ many, if not all, words indifferently in is, es, or eis, as partis, partes, or parteis; and in the accusative and ablative sing. of the same declension, in many words these terminations are indifferently used, as might be shown by innumerable examples. That e and o also are thus interchangeably used, is evident in pendo, pondus, tego, toga, and in the Greek words λέγω, λόγος, τέπω, τέπος; and so also o into e, as from vos comes vester; to omit that vostrum and vestrum, advorsum and adversum are read in pure writers. Lastly, the same is likewise to be observed with respect to e and u, u and e, as for instance in percello, perculi, perculsum; juro, dejero, pejero. In the composition of diphthongs, e is a prepositive only in two words, namely hei and heu; but is subjunctive after innumerable words in a, as aedes, aeger, &c. It is subjunctive also after o in words derived from the Greek diphthong oi, as for instance in οἶστος, which makes oestivus, and Οἰδῖπτος, Oedipus. In the contracted notes of the ancients, E. is put for Est, Ennius, Edilis; E. B. Ejus Bonā; E. D. Ejus Domus; E. E. Ejus Etas; E. F. Ejus fecit; E. F. vel E. FIL. Ejus filius.

F f Roman, and now in common uſe, F f Ital. which alſo is in modern uſe, ꝥ ꝥ in old Engliſh, as commonly called, though long after the time of the Saxons, in modern uſe, but chiefly in acts of parliament and proclamations, the ſixth letter in the Hebrew, Latin, and many other alphabets, may ſeem to have loſt its place, and figure in the Greek alphabet now uſed; but however its place is ſupplied in the numerals by ς, which is called Βαϛ ἐπίσημον, and its power of being a vowel, conſonant, and quieſcent letter, which it had in the old Greek alphabet, is ſtill otherwiſe made up. This ſixth Cadmean letter anſwering to 1 was firſt turned to the left, as its original, thus, ς, and afterwards to the right F. The Æolians uſed the former way, and turned it upſide down, thus, ς. Theſe People uſed it before ſoft vowels, writing ςο for ον; for an aſpirate, as, ςολ for δλ; alſo in the middle of words to ſtop a gap between two vowels, in order to prevent their collision, as οας for οα. The old Latins alſo received it from them, only turning it to the right hand, and ſeting it upright as we now uſe it. They, as well as the Æolians, uſed it for h both in the begining and middle of words, writing fordecum for hordecum, veſo for veho; and ſometimes turned it into v, inſtead of οας, writing ovis, thereby ſhowing its affinity to the Hebrew vau. This letter being in the form of two Γ's clapt one upon another, perhaps through the ſupinenefs, or ignorance, of Grammarians, was, and ſo continues to be, called digamma. Certain it is, that that there is no affinity between the powers of f and g. In after times, this letter growing into diſuſe among all the Greeks, they cut an o into two parts, the former whereof they claped upon words which anciently had begun with the letter h, or its ſubſtitute ς, and the other half upon ſuch as began with a ſoft vowel. The Latins alſo, both in the begining and middle of words aſpirated, reſumed the old letter h, inſtead of foſſis writing hoſtis, and inſtead of traſo, traho. But though its place and analogous uſe favour its deſcent from the Hebrew vau, yet perhaps as much may be ſaid for its pedigree from the Hebrew ς, and ſo make it difficult to determine in that matter. As to its figure it may be as well formed from 1 turning it to the right hand, and adding the middle declineing line, as above; or from the final ς by turning it, and joining to the middle a ſmall line taken from the top; or from the old Greek Γ by takeing its ſhort leg and joining it to the belly. But when we carefully attend to the ſound and power of this letter, we cannot but obſerve that it comes nearer to the ſound of ς phe, and ς phi, than ve and vi, as our Western people ſound it. And in Latin words of Hebrew extraction, ς is more generally changed into f, than v. Thus from the Hebrew ςς comes the Greek φη, and the Latin fera; from ςς, fors; from ςς, fucus, &c. But ſince from what hath been ſaid may be gathered its relation to 1 in place, and primitive uſe, and perhaps in its figure, but that in ſound at leaſt it ſeems more nearly related to the Hebrew ς or the Greek φ, we may conclude it participates of both. And I am inclined to think, that a very probable reaſon may be given for ſuch a concluſion, why the ancient Greeks ſo early diſmiſſed this letter: namely, becauſe haveing otherwiſe ſupplied the uſes it had from the primitive 1, finding its ſound nearly related to their φ, they concluded they had no further occaſion for it, and ſo left it out. But whether it comes nearer to v or ph, this is certain, whatever ſome great men may have argued to the contrary, that it is a mute, and of the firſt rank alſo. Nor is it any argument of its being a liquid, that we put e before it, calling it ef, analogous to the liquids el, em, en, er (for ſo by the way we ought to call that letter, not ar, if we would keep to analogy) whereas in the mutes we pronounce e afterwards, as be, ce, &c. For this cuſtom hath no foundation in the nature of the letter itſelf, nor in the Hebrew or Greek tongues, who ſay not ep and eph, but pe and phe, pi and phi; but hath obtained from the hypercriticiſm, perverſeneſs, ignorance, or inadvertency, of Grammarians. And indeed, if this cuſtom would prove it a ſemivowel, we muſt alſo adopt s into the family of the liquids, and what is ſtill more abſurd, make a ſemivowel of two conſonants, whereof at leaſt they confeſs one to be a mute, namely x, which they call ex, juſt with as much reaſon as they call f, ef. Beſides, f precedes the liquids l and r in the ſame ſyllable, as in ſlos, fraus, &c. and ſurely in Latin words two liquids cannot begin a ſyllable. G Latin, & g in the old black English letter, as commonly called, in Hebrew ג, in Greek Γ γ, in both which tongues it is the third Letter, was not in ufe amongst the Romans till about the fecond Punick war, being firft introduced by Sp. Carvilius, as Plutarch informs us in his 54th Roman Problem; nor did they then admitt it into its third place, invaded by the ufurper c, and now fettled by prefcription: however, they placed it in a good neighbourhood, between its kindred f and h, which, upon occafion, mutually ferve each other. But though c may juftly be called an ufurper with refpect to its order in the alphabet, we muft allow it a kind of right, by haveing been invested with the power and found of g. For it is certain that the old Romans, who writ pucna and Carthaco, read pugna, and Carthago; otherwife, after the admiffion of g, they would ftill have retained the priſtine c in thefe and the like words. If any ſhould ask how the ancient Romans could know before this letter g came into ufe, where and in what words to pronounce either found? it muft be answered, by ufe alone: For that this might be known fo, may be exemplified by a hundred inſtances in our own language; to give only one, we are at no lofs how to found that and thatch, the and theme, this and thistle, thou and thouſand, thus and thumb; and innumerable words of this kind. This indeed muft be owned, that to give feveral founds to one and the ſame letter, makes any language, and particularly our own, as in the above inſtance, more difficult to be learned, and eſpecially by foreigners. To remedy which inconvenience, the Romans ſeem to have taken in the letter g. And here I cannot but remark how we have acted the reverſe; they took in g, which they had not, to make their own tongue more eaſy; we have laid aſide p and x, which we had, to make ours more difficult; which is very unaccountable.

But to proceed; from the Hebrew ג Gimel, which was emphatically called Gamla, from גמל a camel, becauſe of the bunch on its back, the Greeks gave it the name of Gamma: Some think the Latin G received its figure immediately alſo from the ſame letter; others from the cognate p, which, when turned to the right, C, much reſembles G. I ſhould think it more probably received its form immediately from the Hebrew ג, I mean from Γ, ſince, as I before obſerved, the letter c originally had the power and found of the after invented g, as well as its own; and ſo when the Romans admitted it, they might make it with good reaſon differ no more from c in figure, than in found. For indeed theſe letters differ only thus, c is a ſofter g, as g is a harder c. Hence it comes to paſs, that in declining, the harder g before a vowel is before a conſonant changed into the ſofter c, as lego, legi, lectum, ago, egi, actum, &c. not legtum, agtum, which would be too hard. For this reaſon, jungo, rego, tego, &c. in the perfect tenſes, are read before the formative s, juncſi, recſi, tecſi, not jungſi, regſi, tegſi; for ſo, if we may believe Iſidore, before the age of Auguſtus ſuch words were uſually written, not by x; which, being only a more compendious way of writing, made Quintilian ſay, Inſtit. 1, 6. that the Romans might have been without it; as they might have continued to write cs, or gs, as in recs, apecs. The letter g ſometimes alſo ſeems related to z, as we write indifferently zinziber, and gingiber. The cognation of this letter and c is ſo cloſe, that in ſome words either of them may be uſed; as Caius, or Guins; Cneus, or Gneus; vigeſimus, or viceſimus, from viginti; and they are often changed into each other: for as from viginti, comes viceſimus; ſo from centum, is derived quingenti. In Greek this letter, being in the middle of the ſecond rank of the mutes, is changed not only into x but into χ alſo, as in the ſecond conjugation, which conſiſts of this order of the mutes, may plainly be obſerved; for example lego, f. lecſo, p. lelecha; inſtead of legſo, lelegba, the harder found. I cannot forbear to obſerve here, that both the Greeks and Romans allways, and before all vowels, pronounced this letter hard, found- ing γένος and genus, γίγας and gigas, as we do in get and give, never as we do in generation and ginger; which irregular and uncertain pronunciation of this letter, as well as the cognate c, proves often a great diſcouragement to thoſe who deſire to learn our tongue; and, together with our different found of the vowels, makes our Latin, though much purer generally than theirs, almoſt as unintelligible as our English. In the notes of the ancients, G. is put for Gaius, Gellius, gens, genius; GER. Germanus, Germanicus; G. G. Gemina, geſſit, geſſerunt; GA. Galeria, Gallus, Gallia; G. Hh, English black letter h h, English Saxon p, which seems to have received its figure from its original the Hebrew h. The Phœnicians, most ancient Greeks, and Romans, used the same figure with our English H, which in the series of all their alphabets keeps its primitive place, being the eighth letter. The less ancient Greeks indeed, not contented that their letter E should denote both the short and long sounds, as their ancestors were, witness the divine Plato, and his voucher the lately discovered Sigeian monument, having consulted to express the long sound of E, invested it with the figure and order of this letter, endeavouring to supply the want thereof in their old alphabet by a mark of aspiration over the head of its vowel, writinging ἄμα, ὀδός, &c. instead of the old Ionic HAMA and HOΔΟΣ; endeavouring, I say, for though they did it conveniently over a vowel beginning a word, they have quite left it out in the middle, writinging Ἐνδοία and Ταῶς, for ENHOΔIA and TAHΩS; and where it occurred after the letter P, they have attempted it somewhat preposterously, for PHAMNOS, PHTΩP, ΠΥΡΡΗΟΣ, &c. writinging Ῥάμνος, Ῥήτωρ, Πυρρῆος, where the mark of aspiration is put before, but founded after the consonant. This extermination by the Greeks, being very ancient, was probably the reason why some of the ancient grammarians, and among the rest our great Master Priscian, have controverted its title to be a letter. One argument against it, is, that it is only a pure aspiration, having nothing to assert its right to the elementarian family but the figure, which, if sufficient, would also recommend the numeral notes to the same honour. But with due reverence to so great a man, that it has a power, and that it had a name also in the original, and other the most ancient dialects thereof, is very evident. Besides, if its being an aspiration proves it to be no letter, the original softer h and η, which are often not heard in pronunciation, and the rougher y and η the parent of H, must be exterminated the Hebrew alphabet: and surely he would not have compared h and a numeral mark, had he reflected that the former is an individual part of a syllable, the latter the characteristick of a whole word, two quite different things. But he insists, "If it be a letter, it must either be a vowel or a consonant." Yea, certainly. And that it is no vowel, though a constant retainer to that family, may be easily granted him; nor will we endeavour to evince its being a liquid, as some have, from its near approach to the nature of a semivowel. But sure it ought not to be excluded the company of the aspirated mutes φ, θ, χ, which were not anciently in the Greek alphabet, and owe their place there purely to their incorporating with this letter. Surely it would be hard to exclude it. H indeed is no other than a hard aspirate, vested with the power of its mother η, and plainly the same as χ, that is, no other than a hard aspiration; and in many Latin words borrowed from the Greeks, is plainly substituted for it, as χάλω, halo, χάω, bio, χάραι, hūmi, &c. and in Latin michi, nichil, for mibi, nihil; which also may be more plain in the formation of Greek verbs ending in the second order of the mutes, which constitute their second conjugation, with that of the Latin verbs of the same termination; for as πλέω, λέγω, τρέχω, move into ξ in the future tense; so dico, lego, veho, move into xi in the perfect tense. But others think it no letter, because the Latin Poets generally, and the Greek often, neglect it, treating it as if it were not there at all. This argument proves so much, that indeed it proves nothing at all to the purpose: for the final m, together with its vowel, is as much disregarded by the Latin poets; and especially the final s, which even before a consonant, was anciently neglected by both Greek and Roman poets: and indeed our Greek aspiration is frequently expressed in Latin by s, as ἡμι, semi, ἔξ, sex; and are these therefore no letters?

But to proceed: This aspirate is set before all the vowels, as habeo, hebeo, hio, honoro, humeo; but after no consonant, except the three mutes p, c, t, and that only in words of a Greek original, as philosophus, chorus, Theodorus. Servius indeed tells us, the same use had obtained in three Latin words only, viz. sepulchrum, pulcher, orchus; the two first whereof seem to have been so pronounced by some before and in Cicero's time, as he expressly affirms of pulcher. That this way of prefixing and subjoining h to consonants and vowels was indeed used in pronunciation, but condemned by the best judges before Cicero's time, Catullus witnesseth, laughing Arrius to scorn, Ep. 82, for the affecting to pronounce chommoda and hinfidias. Cicero truly soon after, knowing very well that the ancients used not this aspirate insertion, for some time used to say pulcror, Cetegus, and Kartago, yet seems afterwards to have espoused the aspirate way, at least in some words, as judging the sound more masculine and sprightly; for upon that account, as we partly learn from himself, but more expressly from A. Gellius N. A. 2, 3. this custom was introduced. However, this way, though sparingly, and in few words used at first, grew into such a ridiculous excess, that some said chenturia, chorona, præcho, vid. Quint. Instit. Orat. 1, 5. Concerning the intercourse which h hath with the Æolic digamma, see the letter F. H. in the notes of the ancients, notes hic, hæc, hoc, honor, honestus, hæres, homo, habet, hora; HA. I i, and in the black English letter J i, in the Latin I i, in Greek with little variation Ι i, all from the Hebrew י. This vowel having the smallest sound as well as figure, is most fitly suited to low poetical images; as in that of Cicero, Epist. 1, 109.

Nec mihi sunt vires inimicos pellere testis, where you meet with no a, and only once with o and u, but this vowel seven times, and the next small sound e, as it ought, wanting one of that number. But when the subject riseth, as in the sublime, the frequent use of it is to be avoided. For this reason Virgil hath in the Æneid writ olli for illi near twenty times, but never in his Eclogues or Georgicks. Hence also comes the frequent change into u by the ancients, to strengthen the sound, as Jupiter Optumus Maxumus, and many other instances, which might be given out of the old manuscripts of Livy, Tully, and Pliny, plainly show. This vowel in Latin compounds is also substituted for a, as abigo, contingo, defscio, from ago, tango, facio. The sound of this to the next small vowel e is so near, that the Hebrew, and other dialects from that tongue, expressed them both by one character, before the invention of points. And the changes of i into e, and vice versâ, in Latin derivatives from Greek, are too obvious not to be observed; as in μῦθα, mentha, τέγω, tingo. Add also, that in many words which are purely Latin these vowels are indifferently written, as magè and magis, berè and heri; Magè pollens aer, Lucr. 4, 344. Res hodie minor est berè quàm fuit, Juv. 3, 23. Yea, many words in the accusative and ablative cases sing. of the third declension end in em or im, e or i. Also in our English tongue we write indifferently employ, ingage, incourage, indeavour, or employ, engage, &c. and many other words of the same kind. In making the Latin diphthongs, as in Greeks, this vowel is substitutive to the rest, as aio, hei, hoi, hui, lythia. In numerals this, as being the smallest letter, is put for the smallest number, I, one, II, two, &c. and, set before the note of a larger number, subtracts it self, as IV, four, IX, nine. In the notes of the ancients, I. is put for Inter, intra, Junius, Julius; IA. P. Inter provinciam; I. AGL. In angulo; IA. D. Jam diu, jam dudum; IA. S. D. Jam satis dandum; IA. RI. Jam respondi.

J j English and Latin, wanting in the Greek, in Hebrew י, is properly, as well as the rest of their letters, a consonant, and hath a name as such, though in favour of pronunciation they sometimes use it as a vowel. We, in imitation of them, call i and j by one common name, but with this difference, that they give it a name from its consonant use, we from the vocal. We have indeed invented a different figure for the consonant, which has been too much neglected by old writers and printers. It is pronounced commonly in Latin and English, and by some in Hebrew words, like a soft g; but very faultyly; except perhaps in derivatives from the Greek ζ, as Jupiter, from Ζεύς πάτερ, where it may be allowed that harder sound; its true pronunciation being softer, and approaching nearer to that of the vowel, as at this day the Germans and other adjacent nations pronounce it; their jah, and our year being sounded alike. The true sound undoubtedly is near to our y before a vowel in the same syllable, and, if we would follow analogy, this letter ought to be called yé, as we say, bé, cé, &c.
